Freddie Mac Foundation's
Wednesday's Child

Take a close look at this week's Wednesday's Child and you may feel a bit of déjà vu ... and that's because we first introduced you to David two years ago. But a lot changes during one's teen years, so we decided to meet up with David (1995) again to get a sense of the young man he is becoming. This time we met up with David at Goodie Girls in Glendale, California to work with Annette Starbuck from TV's "Cupcake Wars" on the Food Network.

Since the last time we saw David he has taken up cooking. While David finds cooking to be therapeutic, he also tells us that since he's become a pescetarian (a vegetarian who will eat fish) he has to cook his own food – but that he loves doing so! On this segment, David has no trouble getting right to work at making a popular new treat called the "Cake-Up" – a version of childhood favorite, the orange Push-Up.

David is now considering becoming a marine biologist and is mindful about oceanic preservation and consumption of sustainable seafood. David has also taken up the tuba and is in his school's marching band. He tells us that other than the love he has for music, being in the band is the closest thing he has to a family. He says fellow band members may have conflicts with each other but when they come together and play music, all is forgiven because they have one goal, which is what he envisions a family to be.

Off the field, David continues to recognize the inner-strength he possesses to march to the beat of a different drum – but he still wants to march through life as part of a bigger band in the form of a forever family. And helping David find that permanent place to call home ... would be icing on the cake!
